He said the killings could have been done without a motive, perhaps by a demented person.

Lundblad said the bullets were small caliber, that it appeared the Faraday youth stopped his car when a slug was fired through a rear side window of the family station wagon he was driving.

Once the vehicle stopped, the two young people were helpless at the hands of the slayer.

Lundblad said he conducted a dozen interviews with intimates of the slain pair Saturday, and took statements from all of them. He said few could throw any light whatsoever on the case.

Although one of the windows later fogged up as they have in previous spaceflights, the astronauts continued to send back reports on the appearance of earth long after it was only a ball hanging in space.

Early today, Apollo 8 had traveled 90,090 miles from earth and was 140,910 miles from the moon, traveling at 4,340 miles per hour.

The successful checkout of the main rocket engine came during the first of four possible "mid-course correction" maneuvers to make sure the spacecraft was staying on the proper path.

It was also important because the astronauts are depending solely on the main Apollo engine to put them into orbit around the moon Tuesday and get them headed back to earth Wednesday.
